THIS SUNDAY February 14 & BEYOND

A Still Small Voice

Movies and TV series will have us believe that the manifestation of transcendent powers is always accompanied by flashing lights, deafening noises, tremors, strong winds or the like. In fact, this resonates with some Bible passages, particularly those that refer to Moses and the way God manifested to him in the sacred mountain. These divine manifestations are known as theophanies.

One passage in the Second Book of Kings presents a totally different perspective though. It refers to Elijah's encounter with God at Mount Horeb, another name for Mount Sinai, the mountain where Moses was given the Law for God's people. In this account, the writer deliberately precludes Elijah's actual encounter with God with the phenomena that usually signaled theophanies. There was a great wind, an earthquake, and a fire, but the writer specifically states that God was not present in any of these. And then there is a still small voice, or a sound of sheer silence, as some other translations render the expression.

This still small voice is what clearly makes Elijah recognize God's presence. He immediately covers his face reverently and waits for God's instructions to him. God speaks to him within this sheer silence.

This last Sunday after Epiphany brings us the Gospel passage of Jesus' transfiguration. The three synoptic gospels tell this story, and our church lectionaries always end this season with this account. It is the culmination of Jesus' manifestation or revelation as the divine Son.

We might think that Jesus' transfiguration is more in line with the usual theophanies, especially because of the dazzling glorious light that was manifested in Jesus. It may be. But we need to remember that this was mostly a private event. It was meant for the innermost circle of disciples, the three that accompanied Him on special occasions. There was a vision of Moses and Elijah, the greatest representatives of the Law and the Prophets, who had also had theophanies on the Sacred Mount, and had been given divine instructions to follow. And there was the divine voice that repeated what Jesus had heard on His baptism, plus a clear injunction to these three disciples, "Listen to Him".

Being in the glorious presence of the divine is an overwhelming experience. It can give rise to rash reactions, as it did in the case of Peter. He simply expressed his desire to remain in that blissful state for as long as possible. But this was just a moment to be cherished and remembered. They had a taste of Jesus' glory and mission. The presence of Moses and Elijah and their conversation about what Jesus had to undergo was the indication that Jesus was the recapitulation and fulfillment of Holy Scripture. He was the Word made flesh, and His voice needed to be heeded.

Although the transfiguration of Jesus has often been interpreted as a foretaste of His glorious Resurrection, it can also be seen as the presence that always is and we fail to see. The transfiguration was much more about the disciples than about Jesus. It was their inner eyes and ears that needed to be transformed to see and hear the truth about the identity of the one they had been following.

Likewise, we, His present-day followers, need to be transformed to perceive God's constant presence in us and in all others. And in a world that is characterized by so many blinding artificial lights, so much noise and misleading voices, and other phenomena that try to emulate and feign the authentic theophanies, it becomes imperative that we make a pause in our frantic daily turmoil, and turn to the still small voice, to the sound of sheer silence within, so we can perceive Our Lord's Presence and heed His voice.
